What does it mean to be a Christian in a multicultural context and how does creation care fit with our theology of mission? This weekend will look at mission and evangelism which takes these questions seriously. The weekend will offer opportunities to encounter people from other faiths and Christians from a range of cultural backgrounds. "If you want to know what heaven is like, come to Southall, a crowd from every race, nation, language and culture worshipping together". In addition, Southall is home to A Rocha UK, the leading Christian environmental charity, challenging us to consider the Genesis command to rule over and look after creation to God's glory.

St Laurence's, a city centre church in Reading had shrunk in size to half a dozen people. Several years later it now has a thriving young congregation with a sole focus on sharing Jesus and creating Christian community with young people in the city. It's been quite a journey. This weekend will be a chance to hear the story and explore the theology and mission instincts behind the approach. If you are working with young people it will be fantastic. If you are working with a different kind of community don't be put off - the insights gained will spark your imagination for your own context.

A weekend to explore the diversity found across new forms of church. Starting a church with a team of thirty can be a very different experience to starting from scratch with one or two others. This weekend tells the stories of a few churches and mission projects in Sheffield which together show how diverse both the process of starting out and sustaining what grows can be. You'll have the opportunity to visit some of these, hear the stories and together reflect on their theology and practice. They'll also be additional input from researchers in the field able to give a national perspective.

The gospel has as much to say about transforming places and communities as it does about personal renewal. Come and hear the story of The Salvation Army Eden project in Fitton Hill who are working in partnership with other service providers and community groups to bring regeneration in the area. This is a weekend to explore the role the church can play in community transformation. There will also be the opportunity to hear more about the wider work of Eden, and hear about Hope Citadel Health Care a community interest company providing primary health care to some of the more difficult areas of Greater Manchester.
